The Byelaws

Scottish Water

(Milngavie Waterworks) Byelaws 2015

Byelaws for the prevention of pollution and for the regulation of use of water gathering grounds

Scottish Water (Milngavie Waterworks) Byelaws 2015 explained

Milngavie Water Treatment Works provides clear, fresh drinking water to a large number of customers in the Greater Glasgow area, utilising source water from the Loch Lomond and the Trossachs National Park via a system of aqueducts first conceived by the Glasgow Corporation in the 19th Century. This water arrives all the way from Loch Katrine where it is stored at the Milngavie reservoir complex comprising of Craigmaddie and Mugdock reservoirs.

These historic reservoirs are a popular recreational area for the local community and beyond, but also part of the water system. As a result it is vital that Scottish Water is vigilant in protecting this precious resource now and into the future.

Byelaws for the protection against pollution have been in place at the Milngavie reservoirs for many years, enacted by Scottish Water and also our statutory predecessor organisations. The 2015 Byelaws refresh these provisions and will help us to care for this vital resource for the next decade.

How do these byelaws affect you?

These Byelaws place some common sense restrictions on certain activities around the reservoirs. The effect of the Byelaws is to suspend those water-based activities i.e. boating and swimming, which would normally be permitted under the Land Reform Act 2003.

Where do these byelaws apply?

A copy of the Byelaws is detailed in this leaflet, together with a map indicating the area where the restrictions apply.
